

THE BOOT TRADE.

A few weeks ago, it may be remembered, exception was taken by Mr. Thomas White to the statement published in our labour summary every fortnight, that the wages earned by journeymen shoemakers ranged from £2 10s. to £3 10s. per week, and Mr. White offered to conduct a reporter from this journal to the various boot warehouses and factories in this city, in order that he might ascertain with accuracy exactly what amount of wages these handicraftsmen earn. That offer was accepted, and during that past week a number of our staff has been engaged in making inquiries on the subject. He has, in company with Mr. White, visited most of the leading establishments where boots and shoes are manufactured; he has also called upon a number of the smaller makers; and he has seen a good many of the workmen engaged at their craft, both in the factories and in their own homes. Everywhere he was received with courtesy by the trade, and every disposition was shown to give the information sought. The masters in most cases produced their wages-books for inspection, and the men as freely gave evidence as to their earnings; there was a remarkable unanimity in the accounts given on both sides, and in consequence of the statements thus made we have altered the quotations in our labour summary to stand now at £1 10s. to £2 10s. per week, which represents the average earnings in the trade. It is true there are some workmen who earn the figures formerly quoted; a few draw even more money per week, but these are exceptional cases, where either a workman is unusually skillful, or is assisted in some degree by the members of his family, or otherwise works during excessively long hours. In putting our questions to both masters and men we expressly requested them to leave out of their calculations the cost of materials, that were the cost of an ordinary good and sturdy workman labouring during the usual hours in the trade, which appear to be a rule from ten to twelve hours. The figures we give therefore show the income of a reasonably good workman when trade is brisk; but it must be remembered that there are times when business is slack, and when a man, however anxious he may be to work, cannot get full work to do, so that even the steadiest workman is liable to find his earnings curtailed from this cause. Again, it is said that out of the two thousand shoemakers employed in and about Sydney there is a large proportion who are not entitled to be called even "reasonably good workmen," and whose wages do not amount to nearly so much as our quotations. Many of them too, it is said, are in the habit of keeping Sainsbury Monday most religiously, and therefore do not feel particularly fit for work on Tuesday, so that their week's work really does not commence before Wednesday. This class of men, again, even though they work long hours on the last day or two of the week, will rarely draw the amount of wages that we have set down as the average. Indeed, taking one with another, and selecting off the slow and unsteady workmen against those who are skillful and speedy, it is probable that he who is not entitled to be called even "reasonably good workmen" is not entitled to be called even "good workmen," and that the wages he is paid are equally divided among them, they would not receive more than 20s. to 25s. per week each. But in justice to the men, while claiming to the time they lose by holiday-making, it is only fair to state that, in their turn, make complaints against the masters for keeping them waiting for work. For instance, the men say that when they "shop," or take their finished work on Saturday night, the master, being busy with his customers, tells them to call for a fresh supply of work on Monday morning. They do so, and find that the work is not ready, and are requested to call in a couple of hours. Even then, probably, the work is not ready, so that they frequently lose a day, or the best part of a day, in this manner. Indeed, some of the workmen affirm that the masters will not allow them to earn more than a certain amount per week, and purposely keep them waiting in order to prevent them earning too much. This statement we do not vouch for, as the masters, in their turn, complain that the men will not do the work as fast as they require it, and that they have to keep their customers waiting in consequence. It seems to be an admitted fact that really superior workmen in our work are scarce in Sydney, and the supply is not likely to be replenished here, for the European apprenticeship to learn the trade has not been adopted; and, as the pricing of wages here is rather under that which obtains in England, there is little inducement for a first-class hand to come out from home.

Before transcribing the statements made to us by the various masters and men, a few remarks explanatory of the nature of the boot and shoe trade may be of use. A large proportion of those who keep boot-makers, "warehouses, emporiums, and shops on both sides of the street, are simply vendors of boots and shoes either imported from England, or purchased in this colony. The cordwainers are made of wood (generally box wood), the machine-maker uses iron lasts. The cordwainers sit down to his work, holding his boot in his lap. The machine-maker, on the contrary, places his last, bottom upward, on an iron stand attached to a bench, and he stands up to his work. An old proverb says that a cobbler must have elbow room; and, in fact, he requires considerable space, for when his thread is long, he must draw out both arms to their full extent. But the maker of pegged boots has only to use his hammer, and consequently does not need so much room; in fact, in some of the factories they stand so close together that they almost touch one another. Having lashed his boot, the maker puts the sole in its place, and proceeds to fasten it on with metal or wooden pegs, very little skill being required than the ability to make a hole with the awl and drive in the peg with a hammer. The work being so easily performed, is of course easily learned; consequently a great deal of it is done by boys, who are put to the trade often at the age of ten or eleven years, and become journeymen on their own account by the time they are fourteen. Great complaints are made by some of the masters of boys employed in some of the smaller factories, but seems to be one of the evils necessarily incident to the nature of the trade. The labour of a boy seems cheaper than that of a man, and where there is no much competition as there is in the boot trade it is only natural that the employers should seek to get their work done as cheaply as possible. The greatest evil is that which accrues to the boys themselves. They are put to the work at an age when they ought to be at school; they are compelled to work in many instances in close, crowded, and unhealthy apartments; they mix with men who do not always set them a good example, and as their wants are few they can easily earn enough money to supply their absolute necessities, and of course of their time they too often spend in the pursuit of very questionable pleasures, and the acquisition of habits that will prove their bane through life. In some of the factories, too, there is no care taken to ensure the separation of the sexes, and the young girls who work the sewing-machines mix up with these growing lads without check or hindrance, in a manner likely to prove detrimental to the morals of both. Some of the larger factories, it is true, are well built, well arranged, and properly arranged, and the masters are under proper supervision; but a visit to some of the factories, especially in the smaller towns, would convince our legislators of the necessity for a school of trade, the pricing of wages here is rather under that which obtains in England, there is little inducement for a first-class hand to come out from home.

In a subsequent article we shall speak of the finishing branch of the machine-work, and refer to the saving of boots by machinery. We shall then give more in detail the information supplied by the various members of the trade.
